- If you own a business, it may be that you need to consider adding ‘Business Continuation Clauses’ to your Will. However, you will only need to take this action if your business would not be able to continue in the event of your death. This usually applies to Sole Proprietors who are the day to day managers of their own business. The Business Continuation Clauses will allow your executors to continue the business as normal, pay staff, pay suppliers and generally maintain the value of the business until your estate is settled. Without such clauses, no one would have full rights to continue the business. Limited company directors do not normally need such clauses unless no other director would be able to run the business. A Partnership should have a Partnership Agreement in force.
- You are permitted to appoint a separate business Executor; someone who will have a good understanding of your business.
- You may also consider a separate Business Power of Attorney so that in the event of your incapacity, someone with the required expertise could maintain your business until a long term solution is established.
